Sega of America announced today that they have plans to bring back their SNES Classic Mini and 'mini' handheld for the Nintendo Switch. The SNES Classic will be released on November 11 in stores for $79.99. The new Nintendo Switch mini, due out in 2018, will retail for $149.99. Sega says that the mini SNES will be fully compatible with the new Nintendo Switch game and will work with the Nintendo Switch Online subscription service. It will have eight games from the Super Nintendo Entertainment System including Super Mario World, The Legend of Zelda: A Link to the Past, Super Mario Kart, EarthBound, and others. The mini SNES release date will coincide with the launch of Nintendo Switch Online, a paid service that lets players play classic games online with other people. In 2017 Sega released the mini SNES for the Wii U, which was less than two inches long, and included two games: Super Mario World and The Legend of Zelda: A Link to the Past. However, this version didn't include Super Mario Kart or Super Mario World 2: Yoshi's Island, two games on the original SNES Mini that have been featured on other Super Nintendo Mini consoles. On the console side of things, the Nintendo Switch will launch November 10 for $299.99 and will let players use it as a console to play original Nintendo games or play with local players. So here is the result of the absolutely incredible amount of hard work put into this website. This website is the single most successful diet and exercise website on the Internet, and I'd say by a very big margin. For an example of what I mean, I'll say that this site receives around one million unique visitors each month, while competitors I would estimate receive around half a million each month. That's 2 million total visitors each month, without factoring in the number of "followers" who view the blog on Facebook or Twitter. Not bad for a site that looks like a website for somebody that's the 82157476af
